

Only in Washington, D.C., could a system that works more than 99% of the time be considered broken.

Thousands of deals between local TV stations and their cable and satellite service partners are successfully negotiated each year. This system, known as the retransmission consent process, is working as Congress intended.

So why are certain cable and satellite companies telling Congress the system is broken?

Because they'd like to turn back the clock to a time when they used broadcasters' signals without permission and resold them to subscribers, making millions.

Let the free market work and oppose legislation that would upend the retransmission consent system. The current process provides incentives for all parties to come to mutually beneficial arrangements, which is why it works more than 99 percent of the time.

Learn more about how this process benefits TV viewers and how changing it could impact them at KeepMyTV.org.